

Technology and Impatience

Is our society really becoming more impatient because the use of technology? Our world has become such a fast-paste environment, that it has become natural to our society. Everywhere you go, you mostly always seem to see someone running around for something.

Brenda Payton explains her theory in her article, "Reliance on Computers Fosters Impatience." Payton explains that people are becoming an impatient society because of the computer and other time-saving devices. I agree with Payton and her article. Society has become very fast-paste and impatient.

There are many reasons why our society has become impatient. One reason why our society has become impatient is the result of computers. Computers have advanced greatly since they first came out onto the market. Computers now have many different qualities, such as the internet, music, CD and DVD burner and much more. These qualities bring everything to you much faster.

Having these qualities on your computer get you use to not having to wait for anything. Because our society has become so use to these qualities, when there is difficulties we get impatient. The internet for instance, that is when I become impatient. I try to go to a website to print out an article for a school project. I get so frustrated that it's taking so long. I begin to click the website again and again. Before I know it, it is taking longer because I had clicked the website to many times. At this point I just walk away and wait until later.

Another reason why society has become impatient is the result of cell phones. Society has become so use to having cell phones and getting results fast, because of cell phones. When there is difficulties with our cell phone we become very impatient. When my cell phone or a friends cell phone doesn't work, it's like I don't even know what to do. I become so frustrated because I can't get ahold of them. If I would just calm down, I would realize

I could maybe find them or get a hold of them somewhere else.

Technology has come a long way from what it use to be. Devices have become faster and more intelligent. Technology has helped society out a great deal.

But sometimes I think, is it really worth it? Technology has brought us good qualities but also a ^{brought} very fast-paste and impatient lifestyle. Whenever society gets impatient, we should just stop to think and realize that it could be worse, we could have no technology at all.
